

MODERN ENGLISH: THE USE OF LOANWORDS IN DIGITAL PRESS AND MESTRAL SCHOOL

This paper presents an Analysis of the usage of English loanwords (Anglicisms) which is made both in online texts and in the Mestral School.

In the first place, we make an introduction to the stages and features of the English language to understand how it has become the lingua franca of today. Next, we analyse a list of these Loanwords on digital media and we compare it to the frequency in our school. As for the written press samples, they have appeared within a 60-day time lapse, and as for those terms in school, I've analysed them via a survey.

In a more and more globalised world, it's interesting to see how these loanwords appear at the same level in both oral and written language. What's surprising is that they are very present in different topics, not only specialized or technical ones

Normally, the English loanword is preferred over its native counterpart for several reasons, but not very often due to the lack of an equivalent term. Its usage is very widespread and seems unstoppable in all ages, but It's especially abundant among young people, where it seems that the use of these loans reinforces a feeling of community.
